The premise of taxing the rich to help the poor is flawed.

Higher priced health care (and the implied superior coverage and perks) are meant to be exactly what they are; a benefit earned, a reward. Penalizing companies that recognize the need to offer such perks to obtain high caliber talent is wrong.

One of the benefits of superior health plans is no doubt, the ease with which a member can use that health plan. As evidenced by reading the IRS concerns regarding " who is an employer?" or " who is the plan administer?", it is clearly a case of once the government gets their feet held to the fire by high-priced, nit-picking lawyers, NOTHING REMAINS SIMPLE.

Lastly, if insurers end up being the entity getting penalized by providing healthcare designed for upper echelon recipients, guess whose rates, premiums and likely service hurdles will become the target to offset those penalties? Yeah, the little guy.
